Even Mayor Gilroy thought that this plea was a little weak, and he suggested that by advertising for men under the clause permitting the employment of unlimited numbers for not more than three days, in special emergencies, he could get plenty of men.

"Have you done anything at all to secure men?" asked Mr. Gilroy.

"I have not," replied the Commissioner.

"I have not," replied the Commissioner.

The present law provides that regular contracts may be made, but there is difficulty about the standard or method of measuring the snow collected.

Finally, the Commissioner was instructed to go ahead and try to do as well as he could under the three-day clause, and to study up some new form of contract to be presented to the Board after Mayor Strong comes in.

"Mr. Andrews could get all the men he wants by sending out half a dozen sandwich men along West and South streets, Chatham Square, the Bowery and Third and Tenth avenues. If those men carried placards announcing that men were wanted to-night at $2 for eight hours, he would get not 1,000 men, but 19,000, by 6 o'clock.
"As to their being citizens, there would be no difficulty about that, for if they were not citizens they would run the risk of not getting their money."

Within ten minutes after the sudden cold snap set in this afternoon, Centre street, Park Row, and the bridge highways were congested, so much so that it was with difficulty pedestrians managed to work their way through the tangled mass of teams and cars around the bridge entrance.

The trouble began on the south driveway of the bridge, when five teams became stalled owing to the slippery condition of the pavement. In a few minutes the line of teams extended into Park Row. Third avenue cable, Fourth avenue, Bleecker street and Grand street cars were unable to proceed.
